In those days, did the same rules apply to a Guardian's daughter marrying the Crown Prince as they do today, I really don't think so. It is a formality, after all. I think she was allowed to go to the Palace and give birth to the Crown Princess, and was then allowed to return home. I don't know if the rest of that went back and forth. I have no idea if a child has ever been born to the Crown Princess and the Crown Prince after the Palace and the country are allowed to know that the relationship has blossomed. According to the Beijing Gazette, in May, 2006, the Royal Palace announces an engagement between Goh, and then the subsequent wedding. Which is fine. Everyone knows about their impending nuptials before the actual event. I don't think the marriage will be a "formal ceremony" with all the fanfare and pomp that comes along with it, but I think it will be a quiet wedding in the countryside, which takes place in the year 2010. Though I don't know if this is exactly what the situation is at this time, as I am no great expert in this field. The fact is that the situation at present, is that these two young lovers are considered "naked" and "in the spotlight" because they have fallen in love with each other. It really does not matter whether she is the one with the title of Royal Princess, and he is the one with the title of Crown Prince. "Royal" has nothing to do with the matter. In China, where everything is a matter of social status, when two people fall in love, it is a "love" of the social elite. For a plain Englishman like myself, it is about the person whom you love. The more elevated the social status of the two people, the more "special" the love is. But for a Chinese, it is always a "love
